Pdf As you can imagine your first observation will be that you are probably out of your rights to ask questions. It is true that there are all kinds of rights which - and I don't think anyone is questioning them - are intended to balance a persons rights to privacy and property ( including intellectual property) and the state's ability to prevent and punish crimes against those rights. Equivalents of the right against self-incrimination include: In some U.S. jurisdictions the presumption of innocence does not arise until the prosecution has presented evidence to a jury. In the United States the victim is often not in a position to pursue a right of silence until after a plea has been entered by the defendant, or after the defendant has been convicted. The guilty plea can often be taken by an individual with all the procedural rights already in place, as the defendant will often plead guilty at this stage in order to avoid a trial where the outcome will not be in the defendant's favour. For example, if the defendant is found not guilty at trial, he would presumably then have a right to claim that the prosecution has no evidence against him. At that point the right against self-incrimination would then be applicable. In the United States, the right against self-incrimination is grounded in the Fifth Amendment of the United States Constitution, and in the Coram Nobis Act of 1947. The purpose of the right of silence is to protect a suspect against future prosecutions based on self-incriminating statements.

Since the beginning of the 20th century American jurisprudence has largely abandoned the subject of self-incrimination, at least insofar as it relates to the federal courts. The right against self-incrimination has, however, been applied and developed by a number of state courts over the past century. It is generally
