HyperMotion technology is a breakthrough in world football, combining the fidelity of physical human movement with the all-new, intuitive NEXT-GEN ball physics to produce a more authentic, realistic and diverse experience. When we first saw the technology, it was immediately clear it would be a game-changer for many fans and players around the world. For the first time, game developers are able to truly understand how human movement works – and use it to create a new level of experience for players. In FIFA 22, a new player experience brings highly realistic motion capture and positional intelligence to the pitch, working hand-in-hand with the game’s new ball physics and the improvements to ball control. Real-life players will act and behave more like human players, utilizing things like footwork, technique, positioning and acceleration to make every touch or pass a more intelligent one. We wanted to know more about the behind-the-scenes technical work that went into making HyperMotion, so we spoke with key members of the development team.

How do you capture and create real-time player motion to be used in the game? Nicolò Dragone: The combination of motion capture technology and next-generation physics simulations allow FIFA 22 to match the exciting realism of human movement that is so beloved by fans worldwide. The two technologies make for a symbiotic union, both feeding off the other to bring a next-level experience to the game. A key way we did this is by capturing the real-world movement of the 22 players that took part in our motion capture trials. Each player’s movements are captured in real-time using motion capture suits – sensors wrapped around the athlete’s body and head that record every movement in 3D space. This data is then used by a physics engine to create fully-realistic simulations. We’ve already talked a lot about how players are far more diverse and flexible than ever before, but it’s more than just body type – it’s also about how players shift, twist and turn with the ball. The benefits of this are multi-fold: players can make the right decisions while at the same time feel more fluid and agile on the ball. Sebastien Dehaene: To capture those human qualities, we see this as a journey in itself. The goal is to have a realistic simulation that adapts to a player’s movements, but
